The modern era of law clinics at the U of M School of Law arrived in 1957 when the Minnesota State Legislature created a State Public Defenders Program. Almost simultaneous to this ruling, the Minnesota Supreme Court approved the creation of the University of Minnesota State Public Defenders Clinic. In one of the early cases to arrive at the clinic, the family of a man, suffering from rheumatism as a result of his ailments from the police department, was denied benefits for his injuries. The family represented the man, suffering from rheumatism as a result of his ailments from the police department, was denied benefits for his injuries. The family filed a suit against the police department and presented new evidence supporting a claim of negligence on the part of the police. The evidence showed that the police department had failed to provide adequate medical care for the man's condition, and that the police department was aware of the man's condition but failed to provide the necessary medical attention. The case was later settled out of court, with the police department agreeing to pay damages to the family and providing them with medical care for the man's condition.
Throughout the years, the clinics have benefited students and clients in many ways. Cases that have gone through the clinic program range from small and simple to large and complex. For example, the clinic helped a Minneapolis police officer who suffered from rheumatism. Though it might have felt like one to him, the officer's ailments were not considered an "injury" under the law. The clinic helped the officer pursue insurance benefits, arguing that his condition was not work-related. The officer was eventually denied benefits, but his case raised awareness about the legal rights of police officers in similar situations.

The modern era of law clinics at the University of Minnesota, beginning in 1957, reflects the same commitment to providing legal services in a systematic and comprehensive way. The U of M Law Clinics have endured and prospered, providing law students with the ability to acquire a practical education by participating in real-world legal work. The clinics have benefited both students and clients, providing a superior means of teaching the essence of law. Often lost in the shift from apprenticeship to law schools was the practical education of its students by devoting an ever-increasing amount of its 3L year to on-campus clinics. Using law firms to help law students gain practical experience was controversial at a time when most law schools had a large faculty and many students. In the 1970s, the number of students taking part-time jobs in law firms increased rapidly. In fact, more law students worked in law firms during the 1970s than in the 1960s. By the time the court rendered a decision—against the lawyers who had challenged the legal clinics—a portion of the faculty had already become committed to the concept of legal clinics. The faculty, as she puts it, often serve as “a labor of love” for the clinics.

In the late 1970s, the clinics began to receive more support from the Ford Foundation. The foundation’s support was instrumental in the development of the clinics. The foundation awarded a $40,000 grant from the Ford Foundation’s Council for Professional Responsibility for the law clinics in 1974. The grant was used to support the law clinics and to hire additional faculty. The faculty included Kathryn Sedo, Simon and Befort professors, as well as tenure track professors in the College of Liberal Arts.

In the 1980s, the law clinics continued to grow. By the 1980s, the law clinics were a more established part of the Law School. The law clinics were expanded to include more clinics, and the number of students and faculty involved in the clinics increased. The law clinics were also expanding to include more pro bono work and community service.

The law clinics continue to be a vital part of the Law School’s mission of service. The clinics continue to offer a wide range of pro bono work and community service opportunities. The clinics continue to be a leader in legal education and professional responsibility. The law clinics continue to be a leader in legal education and professional responsibility.
Bracken the year, the clinics have benefited with students and clients in many ways. Case that have gone through the clinic program hanging alive and vital to learn self-helped means of bringing legal rights, making the law clinic’s mission a reality. The law clinics to the larger community are far more than just a legal service. Following is a law of the clinic program note a commitment, hard work, and political and social issues including private justice, child protection, child welfare, discrimination, and other important issues.

THE SMALL PRACTICE CLINIC appeared in 1968 in the Minneapolis after the discovery that the University of Minnesota Law School had agreed to take part in a project to provide low-cost legal services to the city’s poor.
